Over the past two decades, the Wallace Foundation has focused on educational leadership as a suitable lever for positive change in schools. Over that time, the foundation has made investments in research and practical applications that have demonstrated the impact of merging research findings and practitioner’s efforts. This presentation will illustrate how this merging has worked successfully and produced potential replication as evidenced by a new effort—a Principal Pipeline Learning Community comprised of 90 of the nation’s largest districts.